

The Crazy Trip of Boston

Wonder what the students on the Boston trip have been up to? Don't worry, we got the perfect little update all ready for you! Starting from the beautiful Schiphol on Friday to the Harvard Square on Monday. So get your American flags out for this blog on the Boston trip!

Up and away! (Day 1)

To start everything off, at eleven o'clock we all met up at the entrance of Schiphol. Of course we had to get through all the security and like every single airport, it was a pain. Being in a big group is definitely hard to handle in such a busy airport. However, we still managed and after around two hours we were at our gate ready to fly away without any major issues or problems.

The flight was great and it went smoothly. We all had dinner and ice cream in the plane as well.

After we landed we all got through the last security check, got our luggage and met up with the host families. From that point on everyone went their different ways and the day ended after being in a plane for eight hours.

The hectic weekend (Day 2-3)

So now on to more exciting stuff than a plane flight. Things that are definitely noticeable in America, or just Boston, is that there are American flags everywhere, and even more Dunkin' Donuts restaurants. Every shopping area there is a Dunkin' Donuts around - I have even spotted two Dunkin' Donuts being opposite of each other -.

Anyways lets not talk about donuts but our weekend, everyone did whatever they wanted for the weekend. Some went to Boston to go shopping, others went to museums and others went apple picking, a tradition of New England, and others did some different things. One thing for sure is that there was a lot to do and sometimes even hectic.

On Sunday we all met up again for lunch at the Cheesecake factory in Cambridge, the American Cambridge not the British one, there we all ordered our own food and the sizes were gigantic. After our tummies were filled, some split up from the group to go do their own thing and others hung out together some more.

Newman (Day 4)

For the most recent day we went to Newman, the school our hosts go to. There we followed some American classes and we did a presentation on the Dutch culture. Afterwards we travelled to Harvard Square and did a little bit of sightseeing and then of course, shopping.

Then we met up with our hosts back in Newman and split up again.

And now...

The trip so far has been an amazing experience and new friendships have already come to us. A lot of the days it depends on what our hosts want to do. That is a great thing since it lets us all have different experiences at this trip and for us to share with each other. We can wait to get home, since this trip is the experience of a lifetime.
